SINGERS BEST WHEN SILENT Italian Opera Performers Not

Suited to the Work. nade its second production last night at he Century Theatre, where it presented Louis Ganne's "I Saltimbanchi," an operetta, which the Sicilian comic opera troupe gave at the Majestic Theatre two easons ago. Last night's performance had in it a novelty in that the music was considerably changed about, airs being taken in one instance from the Plot Lacks Substance and contraite and given to the tener, who in the original version was a barytone. The performance was again best when there was no singing, despite the fact that the Marion of Mme. Gattini did possess at times what ought to have been an excellent voice.

The buffo work of E. Gargano and A. Fiori was excellent, and the scenery of the last two acts-the second being a set from the Metropolitan and the last one "The Daughter of Heaven"-was really fine.

The orchestra played better than on the opening night, but the ballet again grievously offended. The audience, a large one, composed mainly of Italians, appeared abundantly pleased. It is only just to the composer to state that the charm and spirit of his delightful work quite evaporated under the crude methods employed last night. The Italian appears little at home in modern operetta, and when he sings to is in an idlom that he does not understand. However, there is a large Italian colony New York, and to it the advent of the present company may be grateful.
